The late twentieth century depicts medical practice as being technologically advance-orientated environment. These rapid developments in medical science and technology have awakened many questions, which touches on the ethical, legal and religious issues. As a complete and comprehensive way of life, the teachings of Islam encompasses all fields of human endeavours whether, spiritual or material. Islamic law is required to establish rights and responsibilities in this developing area to keep pace with advances in medicine and medical technology. Legal and ethical dilemmas that arise from various medical research is inseparable from the religion itself. These deliberations must remain and flourish within the confines of Islamic medical law.
